Our container images are available on Docker Hub and all the cloud providers' public registries. Our Container for Mac OS X is now available on Mac App Store. We contribute code and design to other projects. Docker was designed to solve the problems with running legacy applications, or modern applications in containers. Our goal is to build the future of the industry and we're here to support all developers who are building apps on top of it. Q: Is there a way to compare two dictionaries? I've got two dictionaries, which keys are urls and I need to find those links which are not in the second dictionary. Is there any built-in way of doing this? A: You can use set.intersection to see if any of the items in the first dictionary are also in the second. But if you want to know if the second dictionary contains items not in the first, then probably not, unless one of the items in the first dictionary is an empty set, and it's not clear whether an empty set is an item in the second dictionary. A: Modifying the following to use django syntax: from django.db import connection from django.utils import simplejson for domain in domain_list: url = domain[0] if not (connection.queries.filter(url=url).count() > 0): # Add the domain to the new set new_set.add(domain) If you think you could benefit from any other feature of django, however, I'd suggest using a dictionary comprehension. of their intended use or for any other reason, the Defendant is unable to deliver the products to the plaintiff.
